Learning Objectives:

By the end of this lesson, participants will be able to:

- Recognize the Call to Being Hospitable – Explore how Abram’s journey in Genesis 12 mirrors the experiences of immigrants today and how God’s call to “go” includes the responsibility to welcome and care for the sojourner.
- Understand the Principle of God’s Blessing Beyond Borders – Examine how God’s covenant with Abram (“all peoples on earth will be blessed through you”) challenges communities of faith to see immigrants not as outsiders, but as integral to God’s vision of mutual flourishing.

Opening Story

Ivon Matamoros is a DREAMer who came to the United States from Mexico when she was 15 years old. She has lived in Arizona with her parents and sisters since that time. After graduating from high school in Phoenix, she got engaged and planned to marry in March 2011. Ivon has always been very active in her church, which is where she met her husband. She and her husband now have a nine-month-old U.S. citizen daughter named Zurisadai.

Called to Journey, Called to Welcome

The day before her wedding, Ivon was arrested during a worksite raid conducted by Sheriff Arpaio's Maricopa County Sheriff's Office. Ivon was detained and charged with using false documents, which is a felony under Arizona law. She had no previous criminal convictions. Because Ivon came to the United States as a child, she is eligible to temporarily remain in the United States under the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA) program. She was working at the restaurant to earn money to pay for her DACA fees.

Ivon became ineligible for DACA and legalization because of her felony conviction under Arizona law. She now faces deportation and permanent separation from her family.

Biblical Story

In Genesis 12, Abram is called by God to leave his homeland and journey to an unfamiliar place, relying on faith and divine promise. His migration is not just about personal destiny but about becoming a vessel of blessing for “all peoples on earth.” This passage reflects the realities of immigrants today — leaving behind the familiar in pursuit of safety, opportunity, and a future shaped by faith and hope. Abram's journey reminds us that migration is a deeply spiritual act, often filled with uncertainty but also with the possibility of renewal and blessing. His story challenges us to see those who migrate not as strangers to be feared, but as fellow travelers in God's unfolding plan.

As people of faith, we are called to embrace the example set in Genesis 12 by extending radical hospitality to immigrants and sojourners. Just as Abram was welcomed in new lands and became a source of blessing, we too are invited to create communities where the alien is not just tolerated but embraced as part of God's vision for mutual flourishing. Welcoming the immigrant is not an optional act of charity — it is a fundamental reflection of God's covenant with humanity. By standing in solidarity with those who journey in faith, we become active participants in the same divine story of movement, promise, and hope that began with Abram.

History

The narrative of Abram's migration in Genesis 12 provides a theological framework for understanding immigration as a sacred journey marked by faith, uncertainty, and divine promise. Abram's departure from his homeland mirrors the experience of countless immigrants who leave behind familiarity in pursuit of safety and opportunity. His journey is not solely for his own benefit but is deeply tied to God's covenantal vision, in which he becomes a blessing to all nations. This theological lens challenges contemporary faith communities to view immigration not merely as a political or economic issue but as a moral and spiritual concern. The biblical imperative to welcome the sojourner, embedded in Abram's story, underscores the ethical responsibility to support those seeking refuge and stability in new lands.

A historical parallel to this narrative can be found in the Displaced Persons Act of 1948, which provided a structured yet imperfect pathway for refugees to resettle in the United States, particularly those displaced by World War II. Like Abram, these individuals embarked on uncertain journeys, propelled by the hope of security and a better life. However, legislative barriers and restrictive quotas reflect the tension between the ideals of welcome and the realities of exclusion. Examining this policy through the lens of Genesis 12 invites critical reflection on how contemporary immigration laws align — or fail to align — with the biblical mandate of hospitality. By engaging this intersection of scripture and policy, faith communities can cultivate a more just and compassionate response to immigration, recognizing that, like Abram, today's immigrants carry not only personal aspirations but also the potential to contribute to the broader flourishing of society.

Opening Story

Rosario Ortiz was among the earliest to receive Deferred Action for Labor Enforcement (DALE) protections in Las Vegas. (Approved applicants receive a work permit and temporary protection from deportation for two years.)

The 39-year-old came to Las Vegas from Veracruz, Mexico, more than two decades ago. He spent time working in a restaurant and as a handyman. Then, seven years ago, he got a job with a painting company called Unforgettable Coatings.

Called to Journey, Called to Welcome

The problems started with his first paycheck. He says he wasn't paid for two days and also hadn't earned time-and-a-half for overtime, despite working more than 60 hours a week. In fact, Unforgettable Coatings had been cited by the U.S. Labor Department five years earlier for illegal pay practices.

Ortiz says his coworkers were angry but also fearful. When they complained to supervisors, he says, they were rebuffed.

"They said that we had to be grateful to the boss for giving us work, and that because we were undocumented, not everyone would give us work," Ortiz says in Spanish. "We had to thank him."

In 2019, a small group of workers began talking with labor investigators. The threats continued, according to Ortiz.

The following year, a federal court issued an order, prohibiting the company from retaliating against employees who cooperated with investigators. The court found the company had "more likely than not" made statements "intending to quash cooperation."

After President Joseph R. Biden came into office, the Arriba Las Vegas worker center wrote to the Labor Department, asking that current and former employees of Unforgettable Coatings be given protection from deportation so they could testify.

The workers' participation in the investigation eventually led to a settlement in January 2023.

Cory Summerhays, founder and CEO of Unforgettable Coatings, agreed to pay more than $3.6 million in back wages and damages to 593 workers across four states.

Biblical Story

Leviticus 19 is a profound chapter outlining the ethical expectations of God's people. Leviticus 19:33-34 explicitly commands: "When a foreigner resides among you in your land, do not mistreat them. The foreigner residing among you must be treated as your native-born. Love them as yourself, for you were foreigners in Egypt. I am the Lord your God." This passage highlights that God's holiness is expressed not only in worship but also in social and economic justice.

Today, immigrants face significant hardships, including unfair wages, poor working conditions, and legal vulnerability. Exploitation is rampant in industries that rely on immigrant labor, from agriculture to domestic work. The biblical mandate in Leviticus 19 calls for justice, urging us to reject practices that dehumanize and oppress.

As people of faith, we must confront the systems that enable exploitation and advocate for policies that honor the dignity and contributions of immigrants. Loving the stranger is not an optional act of kindness; it is a divine command rooted in our shared history of displacement and deliverance.

History

Leviticus 19 presents a radical vision of justice that resonates throughout history. In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, waves of immigrants arrived in the United States seeking opportunity. But they often encountered prejudice and systemic barriers. The exploitation of Chinese laborers during the railroad expansion; the poor working conditions faced by Mexican farmworkers allowed temporarily into the U.S. under the Bracero Program; and the ongoing struggles of undocumented workers all reflect the failure to uphold the biblical call to fairness and love.

Called to Journey, Called to Welcome

One historical parallel is the 1965 Immigration and Nationality Act, which, while ending racial quotas, failed to address the economic vulnerability of immigrant laborers. Today, policies like family separation, exploitative guest worker programs, and anti-immigrant rhetoric continue to violate the principles outlined in Leviticus 19. Faith communities must respond with advocacy, demanding just labor protections and pathways to legal status for those who contribute to society yet remain marginalized.

Statistics:

- Immigrants make up 73% of U.S. farmworkers, yet many lack legal protections and face wage theft and unsafe conditions (National Agricultural Workers Survey).
- Undocumented immigrants contribute billions in taxes annually but are often ineligible for social benefits (Institute on Taxation and Economic Policy).
- Immigrant workers in meatpacking and agriculture were three times more likely to contract COVID-19 due to lack of workplace protections (CDC Report, 2021).

- Advocate: Support fair labor laws, humane immigration policies, and protections for immigrant workers.

Reflective Questions:

Opening Story

I was born in Honduras in 1992. My father left for the United States when I was five, leaving me with my mother and sister. Our life was marred by poverty and domestic violence, especially after my mother partnered with Faustino, a man who frequently drank and became abusive.

One night, when I was 12, he assaulted me. When I confided in my mother, she didn't believe me and sent me away to work as a servant for his relatives. At 14, desperate for a new beginning, I persuaded my father to take me to the U.S. Our journey spanned over a month, during which I faced harrowing experiences, including being assaulted by armed men on a bus in Guatemala.

Called to Journey, Called to Welcome

Upon reaching the United States, I hoped for safety and opportunity. However, the challenges persisted. Navigating life as an undocumented immigrant presented its own set of hardships, from the constant fear of deportation to limited access to basic services. Despite these obstacles, I remained determined to build a better future, drawing strength from my resilience and the hope that had fueled my journey.

Biblical Story

Deuteronomy 10:17-19 declares:

“For the Lord your God is God of gods and Lord of lords, the great God, mighty and awesome, who shows no partiality and accepts no bribes. He defends the cause of the fatherless and the widow, and loves the foreigner residing among you, giving them food and clothing. And you are to love those who are foreigners, for you yourselves were foreigners in Egypt.”

The command to love the foreigner is rooted in Israel’s own history. The Israelites were once foreigners in Egypt, experiencing the hardships of displacement and oppression. God’s deliverance of Israel from Egypt was not only an act of salvation but also a reminder that their experience as strangers should shape how they treat others who are foreign among them.

This historical reminder serves as both a moral obligation and a theological directive. Just as God extended grace to Israel when they were oppressed foreigners, they are called to extend the same compassion and justice to those who find themselves as strangers within their own land. The call to love the sojourner is thus not an abstract principle but a deeply personal command — because the people of Israel were once in the same vulnerable position.

This passage reveals a central truth: God's love extends beyond borders, demanding justice for those who are most vulnerable, including the immigrant. The call to love the sojourner is rooted in Israel's own historical experience of being strangers in Egypt. Just as God provided for them, they are commanded to care for others. This divine expectation remains relevant as societies wrestle with questions of migration, justice, and belonging.

History

The command in Deuteronomy 10 reflects a broader biblical narrative that consistently centers the experiences of migrants, exiles, and refugees. From the Exodus to the Babylonian exile, the people of God have experienced displacement and divine provision. The ethical imperative to care for the sojourner is not a mere suggestion but a requirement tied to God's own character.

A historical parallel is found in the 1980 Refugee Act, which established a framework for refugee resettlement in the U.S. Despite this, fluctuating policies and enforcement measures have shaped an inconsistent welcome for those fleeing danger. Examining this through the lens of Deuteronomy 10 calls faith communities to advocate for policies that reflect God's justice, ensuring that immigrants are treated with dignity and care.

Opening Story

In March 2003, the Homeland Security Act set into motion what would be the single-largest government reorganization since the creation of the Department of Defense. One of the agencies in the new Department of Homeland Security was the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, now known as U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, or ICE.

Congress granted ICE a unique combination of civil and criminal authorities to better protect national security and public safety in answer to the tragic events on 9/11. Leveraging those authorities, ICE's primary mission is to promote homeland security and public safety through the criminal and civil enforcement of federal laws governing border control, customs, trade and immigration.

ICE now has more than 20,000 law enforcement and support personnel in more than 400 offices in the United States and around the world. The agency has an annual budget of approximately $8 billion, primarily devoted to three operational directorates – Homeland Security Investigations (HSI), Enforcement and Removal Operations (ERO) and Office of the Principal Legal Advisor (OPLA). A fourth directorate – Management and Administration – supports the three operational branches to advance the ICE mission.

Biblical Story

In Ezekiel 47, the prophet describes a river flowing from the Temple, bringing life to the barren lands. The river deepens as it extends outward, signifying God's increasing reach beyond Israel's borders. The passage culminates in a striking command: foreigners dwelling among the Israelites are to be treated as native-born and granted land as an inheritance (Ezekiel 47:22-23).

This vision radically expands the understanding of belonging. In an era where land and heritage were tightly controlled, God declares that those who migrate into the land — those who were once strangers — must be embraced as family. Unlike earlier laws in the Torah, which permitted the fair treatment of sojourners but did not grant them inheritance, Ezekiel envisions a new reality where immigrants are fully incorporated into the people of God. This directly echoes Leviticus 19:33-34, which calls for treating the stranger as one's own, but Ezekiel extends this to the granting of land—a key signifier of belonging and security in ancient Israel.

Called to Journey, Called to Welcome

Furthermore, this river, flowing from the temple and nourishing the land, symbolizes the presence of God extending beyond national borders. The water's increasing depth represents divine abundance, signaling that God's justice is expansive and inclusive. In the same way that this river transforms desolate places into fertile ground, so too does God's justice transform communities when immigrants and refugees are embraced rather than excluded.

History

The boundaries described in Ezekiel 47 match those outlined in Numbers 34, reaffirming God's promise to the people. However, Ezekiel introduces a theological innovation: Sojourners are not merely guests but full members of the community, receiving an inheritance alongside native-born Israelites. This was a radical departure from earlier inheritance laws, which strictly limited land ownership to the twelve tribes of Israel. Ezekiel's vision suggests that a just society is one in which outsiders are not just tolerated but fully included in the economic and social fabric of the nation.

Similarly, in the modern era, the criminalization of migrants and the militarization of borders contradict this biblical vision. The 2003 creation of ICE as a response to 9/11 fueled a false narrative of immigrants as threats, leading to expanded deportation powers under the Patriot Act. This narrative has contributed to inhumane detention practices, family separations, and increasing migrant deaths at the border. The militarization of the U.S.-Mexico border — through operations like Hold the Line and Gatekeeper — has forced migrants into more dangerous routes, leading to record numbers of deaths. The El Paso sector alone reported 195 deaths in 2024, up from 143 the previous year, while New Mexico saw a tenfold increase in migrant deaths over two years.

Called to Journey, Called to Welcome

The criminalization of immigrants also contradicts historical data. A comprehensive 150-year study found that immigrants have consistently had lower incarceration rates than native-born citizens. The idea that immigrants pose a heightened threat to public safety is not supported by empirical evidence but has been used as a political tool to justify harsh immigration policies.

Ezekiel's vision of full incorporation stands in direct contrast to the realities of mass deportations, indefinite detentions, and legal structures that deny immigrants pathways to citizenship. Just as the Israelites returning from exile were called to embrace sojourners as kin, so too must modern societies move beyond exclusionary policies and recognize the rights and dignity of immigrants.

Statistics on Immigration

- Over 117 million people worldwide are forcibly displaced due to conflict and persecution. (UNHCR, 2023)
- Nearly half of the world's refugees are children. (UNICEF, 2023)
- The U.S. asylum backlog now exceeds 1.5 million cases, leaving many in prolonged uncertainty. (TRAC Immigration, 2024)
- Despite political rhetoric, studies consistently show that immigrants have lower incarceration rates than native-born citizens for over 150 years. (National Bureau of Economic Research, 2023)
- Border militarization has led to increasing migrant deaths: 108 people died at the New Mexico border in 2024 — a tenfold increase in two years. (The Guardian, 2024)

Biblical Story

In Matthew 25:31–46, Jesus declares that the righteous will be separated from the unrighteous not by doctrine or dogma, but by their treatment of the most vulnerable: the hungry, the thirsty, the stranger, the naked, the sick, and the imprisoned. What is startling is that Jesus identifies himself with these groups: “I was a stranger, and you welcomed me.”

Called to Journey, Called to Welcome

In today’s world, that stranger may be an asylum-seeking mother crossing a desert with her child. It may be a refugee fleeing war and waiting at a border. It may be a man held in immigration detention, without access to legal representation. The call is clear: to welcome them is to welcome Christ; to ignore them is to reject him.

Jesus does not ask whether they came with documents or not. He asks whether they were received with dignity. This passage places a holy demand on the Church to reorient our response to immigration as a spiritual matter — not just a political one. It reminds us that in the faces of migrants and refugees, we meet the living God.

History

This text echoes in the memory of the Sanctuary Movement, which began in the 1980s when churches across the U.S. offered safe refuge to Central American immigrants fleeing U.S.-backed wars and violence. Declaring their churches as sanctuaries, these communities lived out Matthew 25 by choosing divine law over unjust human laws.

Today, many churches are reviving this witness, providing shelter, legal assistance, and advocacy for families facing deportation or indefinite detention. Faith communities are stepping in where governments have failed, insisting that God’s justice prioritizes the vulnerable, not the powerful.

Matthew 25 offers a spiritual litmus test: How are we responding to the migrant in our midst? Are we acting as sheep who see Christ in the stranger — or goats who look away?

Opening Story

Dana Forrester met her husband, Astley, while on vacation in Jamaica. Astley was working as a security guard at Dana’s hotel when they met. She was grieving the recent loss of her mother at the time and discovered that Astley had also just lost his own mother; this brought them close together. After Dana left, they spoke on the phone every day, becoming extremely close and falling in love. She soon returned to Jamaica, and they were engaged. Dana became pregnant with their daughter, Lilla Lora, who is named after Astley’s late mother.

Called to Journey, Called to Welcome

After applying for the fiancé visa for Astley to come to the U.S., immigration officials told them they should marry right away to secure the waiver needed to consider and waive his previous convictions. As an adolescent in Jamaica, Astley was convicted of possession of marijuana on two separate occasions. The amount was minimal; he was made to pay a small fine to the Jamaican Court and he served no jail time.

Dana and Astley got married in Jamaica but soon discovered that immigration officials had misunderstood the circumstances of their case and gave them incorrect advice. Because of these old and minor marijuana possession charges, Astley cannot come to the United States under any circumstances.

Dana cannot move their family to Jamaica as she is the primary caretaker for her ailing father and has a son from a previous relationship. She is struggling to take care of her family on her own without the support of her husband by her side. Astley calls Dana every morning to wake her up, and they drink coffee and read the Bible together.

Their daughter talks to him every day through Skype and often says that her “daddy is lost and can’t come home.” She has tea parties and plays games with her dad over the computer. Dana’s son, Imanni, is nine years-old and is very close to Astley, seeking out his advice and help with homework.

The Forrester family is now forced to live their lives together through machines and electronic correspondence. They are waiting for the day that they can live together as a family.

Called to Journey, Called to Welcome

Biblical Story

1 Peter 2:4–17 speaks to a displaced, scattered community — people living under imperial rule, often marginalized for their faith. The writer calls them “aliens and strangers,” yet affirms their sacred identity as a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation. These powerful words are not reserved for the powerful — but for the exiled, the vulnerable, and the faithful.

Today, immigrants and refugees are often cast aside by society, yet scripture reminds us that those on the margins are central to God’s mission. In a time when border walls rise and fear-based policies dominate, 1 Peter calls the Church to be a spiritual house of radical welcome. To follow Christ, the “Living Stone rejected by mortals,” is to align ourselves with those rejected today.

The passage challenges us to see the Church not as a fortress of privilege but as a sanctuary of resistance, where the dignity of migrants is affirmed, and systems of injustice are exposed. As people of faith, we must resist the temptation to conform to the world’s definitions of worth and instead live into our calling to be a people of light, truth, and welcome.

History

The language of 1 Peter evokes a people in exile — dispersed, vulnerable, and often powerless. This speaks directly to the experience of global migrants today. Whether fleeing violence in Central America, persecution in Afghanistan, or climate devastation in the Global South, modern-day sojourners embody the exilic condition.

Historically, churches have risen to meet such moments. During the Vietnamese refugee crisis, countless congregations in the U.S. opened their doors to sponsor families, helping them resettle and find community. Similarly, in recent years, faith-led sanctuary movements have worked to shield immigrant families from deportation, offering legal support, housing, and advocacy.

1 Peter invites us to understand these acts not just as charity, but as worship. When the Church takes its place among the vulnerable and builds systems of care, it becomes the living temple God intends — built not with bricks, but with compassion, courage, and justice.

Reflective Questions

1. In what ways have we, as individuals or communities, been “strangers in a strange land”?
2. How might the metaphor of “living stones” shape our call to build communities of safety and dignity for migrants?
3. What does it mean to “honor everyone” in a society that dehumanizes certain groups?
4. How is God calling our church to act as a spiritual sanctuary—not just in words, but in structure, policy, and practice?
